The New Year's Eve 2015 is merely a milestone and reminder that our existence are always in change. Bob Dylan's evergreen became rather curious as a theme song to the sci-fi tale 'Watchmen'. It is an astonishing post-modern cold war fiction and individual crime-fighters' decay and fall. It is also about the time when the '68 generation arose and favored songs like this. However, - now the lyrics backfires. That generation has now grown to be the ones criticized, - these fatal promoters of cold-war politics disguised as social conscience. They need to be set aside as well because their ideal are outdated and a fatal 5D risk. It is as dangerous in this century as the previous. Changing – yet repeating in another turn of the clock.

The movie received polarized reactions for several reasons. Firstly, the cold war is a highly controversial theme where the official public versions are highly protected. Next, such a metaphorical version do include highly unlikely and symbolic events that are not meant to be taken literally. It will seem absurd to those who are not able or willing to do so. Finally, the filming of the story was called a 'developers hell' due to all the problems they experienced. The final movie did not get the qualities as intended.

Anyways, the movie presents several interesting aspects in relation to the 3x3 and 5D model as well. Firstly, it can be quite interesting to relate the stereotyped characters to the MBTI model, which is based on Jung's theories. Moreover, the 3x3 model, that is a merging of Jung and Freud, provides properties for collective Drives and Beliefs. Lastly, the stereotyped characters of such 'super-hero' stories are not that different from the any polytheistic demigods, angels or demons, - the ancient collective archetypes.
